

Snow becomes petals painting the sky with brilliance and wonder
Only to melt and disappear into the earth's embrace.
Spring has come.
Yet it too shall fall

Dreams

Every night I have the same dream.
Visions of us in that place where waiting seemed like all we did.
But I loved that wait because at the end of it
We danced.
We danced and danced and danced until we didn't
Now I wait for when we can dance again.

Anguish of the Bird

Ka-kaw. Coo-coo. Tweet-tweet.
Every bird is distinct and unique.
From the bawk-bawk of the chicken
To the kururu of the pigeon,
To each their own kind.

But what of me, the penguin?
What is it that makes me, me?
Is it my black and white feathers?
The strange “hoooongg” sound I make?
Or is it these useless wings of mine?

I’ve always despised these wings
For they take me nowhere.
Whereas the hawk—oh the hawk
Can go wherever his eyes lay.
If only I could fly.

If only I could kiss the clouds
As one does a lover.
I would make comedians of the seas,
Jokesters of the trees,
And jesters of the sky.

I flapped my wings, praying for takeoff.
I flapped and flapped and flapped.
I flapped so much my pecs would make
Dwayne the Flock Johnson look small.
If I was born with these wings, why can’t I?

Perhaps I already know. It simply isn’t me.
I am no falcon, no hawk, no eagle.
I am a penguin.
Cold and loneliness greet me as an old friend.
And so I dive.
